Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XV. CASTLE WEIBERTREUE. WOMANS FIDELITY. ONE of my most interesting excursions was to Weinsberg, in Wuirtemberg. It lies at the base of the Castle of Weibertreue, or Womans Fidelity. The cars, on entering a tunnel, slackened pace very perceptibly. I saw that the tunnel was lighted in some places, and that its arching was supported by an immense number of beams and pillars. On asking why this was, I was told, in the most complacent manner, that the tunnel had been looked upon for some time with great suspicion, and that a caving-in would not be a surprise at any time. On emerging from it into daylight again, we entered upon a valley of rare beauty. The town of Weinsberg was at our left, and rising above it in queenly glory was a magnificent vine-clad hill, which is crowned with the still wall-girt ruins of the Weibertreue Castle. We were received at the station by a good Suabian of the town, who was expecting us. We threaded street after street of the curious place, and finally reached his home in a quaint old dwelling. Soon a lunch was spread for us, and as we sat and regaled ourselves, our host entertained us with the story of the historical town and of its still more historical castle. I have since found his narrative substantially confirmed by the most reliable authorities on Suabian history. The history of.the castle is really that of the town itself, for in the former lived the ruler (or his representative) of the latter, and his fate, of course, decided that of the men, women, and children in the humble dwellings below his castle. The town was originally a Roman colony, and there is evidence, though doubted by some, that it dates from the Roman Emperor
